The Ceramic Legacy of Anna O. Shepard

1991 edited by Ronald L. Bishop and Frederick W. Lange, University Press of Colorado, Niowt. (This is a book about interdisciplinary research in archaeology, focusing upon the work of a pioneer interdisciplinary scholar, her successes, but to a large extent, her failures. Chapters of particular historical interest are "Shepard, Kidder, and Carnegie" by Raymond H. Thompson, who notes Kidder's unintentional marginalization of Shepard by putting her work in appendices; "Anna O. Shepard: A Correspondence Portrait" by Ronald L. Bishop, who relates some of Shepard's failures to her intellectual and physical isolation from archaeologists; "The 1938 Ceramic Technology Conference - A Review After 50 Years", by Frederick R. Matson; "Anna O. Shepard and Southwestern Archaeology: Ignoring a Cautious Heretic" by Linda S. Cordell; and "The Intellectual Development of Mesoamerican Archaeology and an Assessment of Shepard's Influence", by Robert L. Rands, who argues that Shepard had essentially a negative influence. This volume is an important work not only to historians of archaeology by also to historians interested in interdisciplinary science.). A.L. Christenson.

V. Book/Journal Article Reviews

The Davenport Conspiracy Revisited, by Marshall McKusick, Iowa State University Press, Ames.

All the components of a nineteenth century mystery novel are contained in the Davenport Conspiracy Revisited -- an elusive race of mysterious "Mound Builders", clergymen with flawed characters, pranksters who overestimated their ability to take a joke, a stubborn lawyer, a near deathbed confession -- the only difference is that this is no novel, it actually happened. In this book, McKusick chronicles the circumstances surrounding the discovery by nineteenth century antiquarians of alleged "Mound Builder" artifacts in burial mounds in the Quad Cities area of Iowa and Illinois. The discovery caused considerable debate in the scientific community at the time, and has even recently resurfaced in popular literature concerning early European "invasions" of Americas.

The late nineteenth century setting for the Davenport Conspiracy was the formative period of American anthropology and archaeology. Much archaeological exploration was conducted by amateurs based in local scientific "academies" that functioned more as social clubs
